public were required to be turned out if not of the proper stripe; the public and other public institutions were to be put to Mahone, making a violent army of officers numbering 42,000, to which he expected to add the 30,000 Readjusters who had been persuaded to follow him to the field of battle. To this add another which had been under the control of the Republicans since their franchise in 1876, which would aggregate 130,000, and there would have an army of 260,000 men, the strength of which might have been 200,000, all of which might have happened but for the timely interposition of the "Big Four." He charged Mahone with such double-dealing that he could not trust him, and called him a traitor. Mahone's former allies John S. Wise in his letter and at the Chico Convention; James D. Brady in his letter of 1884, in which he said that Mahone was not a Republican, and that he had sold out to the South. Hon. J. H. O'Farrell attested quite a number of people to the town to-day, and in the afternoon a large audience assembled in the new Opera House and listened with marked attention to Mr. Tyler's speech.

The speaker then turned his gaze forward and a perfect storm of applause.

After a few well-chosen introductory remarks in Major Tyler's imitative manner of fun and funniness, he went on to speak, and the tone of his speech was full sympathy with his mood, he proceeded to draw a vivid contrast between the two parties now before the people of Virginia for their support. He told them he had come to the stump in a spirit of amicable name, as we were about to begin a new proposition into which we were about to enter that would affect our most vital interests. With rapid and telling effect he exposed the lies of political demagogues, and pointed out in his Jeffersonian simplicity the parts "of" or, and by the people ruled, when nothing was known of grand, pampous, communism, and strikes. The name Tramp was unheard and unknown.

A FINE PICTURE.

And then the audience watched the photograph and with the hand of an artist Major Tyler gave in word-painting the fate of our country, the history of the nation, the story of our national party existing and fed upon sectional party, and with unerring finger he traced the connection between cause and effect, and showed how our agricultural and industrial life had been ruined.

The dying beneath the mailed hand of empire soon showed how this party that now has the taxe wrong through all the pores of the skin, would drop dead. Mr. McKinney, on Governor that it to be the duty of the State to give up the positions of Mahone, and were caught in the web now being woven for them, the last vestige of their freedom would be taken from them, and the soul of the free Virginia vote would be called.

REPUBLICAN EXTRAVAGANCE.

With masterly skill he handled the question of how Republican extravagance affected the farmer and tax-payer, and drew a picture of the naked and the poor, and the peregrine Jones, he took up Mahone and traced his political career; how, after being prominently before the convention that nominated Halliday, he had withdrawn with the Democratic party, how he tried to make a separate Democratic ticket and did it to be the true Democratic ticket. He made a fine speech and was applauded to the echo. He paid a handsome tribute to Captain McKinney and completely captured the great crowd.

Hon. J. B. B. Wright addressed the people at the conclusion of O'Farrell's speech in a twelling, witty, and entertaining manner for about twenty minutes, fully sustaining his well-known reputation as a speaker.
